Creation - Chronicle of the Relationship Between Science and Theology Hans Schwarz

Schwarz (Univ. of Regensburg, Germany; Eschatology) has written a series of books explaining theological concepts in language accessible to the lay reader. In this volume, he considers the question of creation from both a scientific and a religious perspective. Holding that the relationship between science and religion-often at odds in the popular mind-can be mutually enriching, he shows that it is possible to accept the scientific explanation of the origin of the universe while at the same time believing in God's creation of the world. His explanations of such topics as the Big Bang theory and the uncertainty principle are both understandable and enlightening. Schwarz offers a good, basic introduction to the topic, surveying historical and current literature while at the same time offering some critical analysis. His respect for both science and religion is shown particularly in his discussion of miracles. He ends with a chapter on developing a Christian understanding of creation that takes into account what scientists have discovered.
